

I would like to briefly advocate that the FCC not enact a measure which would supersede the protections given by state laws such as Indiana's. I would prefer to see a set of regulations that ensure a minimum amount of consumer protection and privacy, while allowing states to enact their own measures if they find the FCC's are not adequate. I am thankful for Indiana's Telephone Privacy law, and receive FAR fewer calls than I did previously. I do not want this to change. I do not want to be forced to change my phone number again on a regular basis to avoid phone solicitations. I prefer my privacy just as it is. Might I also point out that lessened protections in the state of Indiana could be another in a growing list of reasons to not have a land-line phone, and instead just use a cell phone.

Thanks.
